Unveiling the Treasures within Volume 99

The cover of Volume 99 is adorned with a whimsical illustration by Sir John Tenniel, one of Punch's most celebrated cartoonists. The image depicts a group of Punch's characters gathered around a table, engaged in a lively discussion. Among them are Mr. Punch himself, the magazine's mischievous mascot; Toby, the portly dog; and Judy, his mischievous wife.

Inside the volume, readers are treated to a wide array of literary delights. There are biting political cartoons that skewer the Gladstone government, as well as social satires that lampoon the latest fashions and fads. Articles on topics ranging from the Boer War to the New Woman offer thought-provoking insights into the challenges and changes of the day.

But Punch was not just a magazine of satire and social commentary. It was also a showcase for some of the finest literary talent of the Victorian era. W.M. Thackeray, Charles Dickens, and A.A. Milne all contributed to Punch at various times, and their works can be found within the pages of Volume 99.

Exploring the Humor of Punch

Punch's humor was often sharp and biting, but it was also clever and insightful. The magazine's cartoonists had a knack for capturing the absurdities of human behavior, and their images could elicit both laughter and reflection.

One particularly memorable cartoon from Volume 99 depicts a group of suffragettes storming the Houses of Parliament. The women are armed with umbrellas and other household objects, and their faces are contorted in expressions of determination. The caption reads, "The New Woman: 'We're going to vote, whether you like it or not!'"

This cartoon is a humorous take on the growing movement for women's suffrage, but it also highlights the magazine's willingness to tackle controversial issues. Punch was never afraid to speak its mind, and its cartoons often sparked heated debates.
