General Lew Wallace, a brilliant but untested commander, was hastily assigned the daunting task of halting Early's advance.

With limited troops and time, Wallace hastily assembled a hastily assembled force of Union soldiers, militia, and civilians. The unlikely army of 6,000 men took up a defensive position along the Monocacy River, the last natural barrier before Washington.

A Bloody and Costly Battle

On July 9th, the Confederate forces struck with their characteristic ferocity. Despite their valiant efforts, Wallace's outnumbered Union troops were forced to retreat, leaving the path to Washington open. Yet, the battle had not been in vain.
