Savage Rapids Dam was built on the Rogue River in Oregon in 1921. The dam created a reservoir that provided water for irrigation and flood control, but it also blocked the migration of salmon and steelhead trout. Over time, the dam began to deteriorate, and it became clear that it would need to be removed.

In 2009, a coalition of environmental groups, local businesses, and government agencies came together to form the Rogue River Dam Removal Partnership. The partnership's goal was to remove Savage Rapids Dam and restore the Rogue River to its natural state.

The dam removal project was a massive undertaking. It required the removal of over 1 million cubic yards of concrete and sediment. The project also involved the relocation of several endangered species.

The dam removal project was completed in 2010. The removal of the dam has had a significant impact on the Rogue River and its ecosystem. Salmon and steelhead trout are now able to migrate freely up and down the river. The river has also become a popular destination for recreation.
