Building the Headquarters

In the fall of 1777, after suffering a series of defeats at the hands of the British, the Continental Army was in dire straits. With winter approaching, Washington desperately needed a place to house and shelter his troops. He selected Valley Forge as a strategic location, far enough from the British base in Philadelphia to avoid attack but close enough to launch raids and harass British supply lines.

The task of building the headquarters fell to a man named John Lacey, a local farmer and member of the Pennsylvania militia. Lacey and his crew worked tirelessly to construct a two-story fieldstone house on a hill overlooking the encampment. The house featured four rooms on each floor, including a large living room and dining room on the first floor and bedrooms on the second floor.

Washington's Residence

On December 19, 1777, General Washington moved into the newly completed Valley Forge House. He used the house as his headquarters for the next six months, overseeing the training, supplies, and morale of the army. It was here that Washington penned some of his most famous and inspiring letters, rallying his troops to endure the hardships of the winter.

Life at Valley Forge was harsh and unforgiving. The soldiers lived in tents or crude log cabins, and supplies were scarce. Disease and malnutrition ran rampant, claiming the lives of thousands of men. Yet, Washington and his army persevered, thanks in part to the shelter and provisions provided by the Valley Forge House.

A Historic Legacy

After the war, the Valley Forge House remained a private residence. In the 1930s, it was acquired by the National Park Service and restored to its original appearance. Today, the house is a popular tourist destination, allowing visitors to step back in time and experience the conditions endured by Washington and his army.
